

Twentieth-century Chinese Womens Poetry: An Anthology

Door That Is Yet to Speak

*Poetry is the opening and closing of a door
Leaving those who look through to guess
About what is seen during a moment.*

Carl Sandburg

I have sighed
at the door's unclosing and closing, at times I cried at the moment when it opened and shut, I was startled by its banging and slamming

The door, a seam of a crack
a fluttering curtain, a muffled mumbling
how can you make this a large orchard
when you can barely see the wounded leopard, the entire scene?

The short stays of tides, morning and night
are strung into a ring of eternity—
the singer who starts the song may not know its ending!

How can the cooing of pigeons be captured?
the clouds are lonely and rise everywhere,
outside the door, a chestnut splash
shuts in the eternal mystery?

I am a child whose nature not yet changes who loves peeping at the mystery in the door who listens and patiently waits for that moment the door swings open and shuts . . .
1965-69

7. Literally, "days are crippled."
